HE WORRIED OVER A COFFIN HE WAS CARRYING IN HIS CAR.

Thought the Box Contained Tascott, the Alleged Murderer, and Had It Opened. The Discovery Caused His Surprise and Grief-It Was His Mother.

"We are not a superstitious set gener erally," remarked a grizzled baggage mas-ter of the Pittaburg, Fort Wayne and Chi-cago road the other day as he lighted a cigar in the Grand Pacific and sat down for a talk.

"We are not superstitious, but become accustomed more or less to the presence of death in the corpses that are transported in the baggage cars, for a day scarcely goes by but we have from one to three 'stiffs,' as the boys call them, on board. Yet there is always a check held on one's impulses. A fellow don't feel like letting himself out naturally when he knows that a corpse is in the same room with him, or at least I can't, and I'm nearly as tough as they grow, for I've been on this road for fifteen

"What I wanted to tell you about hap pened several years ago. At Fort Wayne as we were coming west, there stood a cof-fin box on the trucks ready to be loaded into the car. It was marked for Denver, and we were to carry it as far as Chicago By the side of the trucks, with one hand upon the box, stood a young and well dressed man, with a band of crape tightly pinned around his silk hat, and known at a glance to be in charge of the remains. Whenever any one accompanies the corpse we always handle it sliently and gently out of respect for their feelings, for there's few of us but have buried our own, and know how to feel for a fellow who sorrows for a loved one.

THE SAD FACED STRANGER. After showing tickets the young man asked permission to ride in the baggage car and was refused, of course. He went away hurriedly and disappeared in the depot. We saw no more of him until the train was ready to pull out, when be ap-peared at the door with a permit to ride in the car signed by the superintendent. That settled it with us. His box was purt ly covered with trunks, as the car was crowded and the run unusually heavy 'Please remove those trunks,' was the first thing the gentleman said. "We complied with the request, and the passenger sat down beside the box on a grip, resting his elbow upon the cover toward the head. He never stirred from that position, unless it was to lay his cheek against the rough pine boards, and I saw tears trickle down his bandsome Who was it covered there?

'Say, Tom,' said my mute on the run 'that fellow's either mighty soft on the stiff or else he's got a live pal in there what he's gettin' away with.'

"That was a stunner. The papers were full of just such happenings, and possibly this fellow had Tascott cooped up there and was spiriting him out to the mountains. I didn't propose to allow anything like that to get by me, and so I laid a plan to trap the fellow and turn him and his charge over to the police. The more I thought over the matter the stronger I was convinced that the attention paid to the remains was unnatural and put on. OPENING THE BOX.

"'Will you wish a lunch at Valparaiso?" I inquired of the stranger when we reached Plymouth.

"Will they bring it to the car? said the young man. "'No,' I replied, but if you want to order dinner we will send one for three instend of two." "Will everything be safe in here!" anx-lously asked the faithful watcher.

'Oh, yes, we'll lock the car. "'All right, I wish you would make an order for me,' and without another word he turned back to his charge, and I don't believe he stirred in that forty mile run. "Instead of sending an order for dinner I telephoned the sheriff of Porter county be at the depot with tools to open a coffin box and coffin, for I thought I had a prize. I then instructed the young man who was helping me to jump out of the car as soon as we had loaded the baggage. and to go into the eating house with the stranger and keep an eye on him.

"When we reached Valparaiso there were twenty minutes for dinner, and it took us but a few minutes to load up the trunks The sheriff stepped up and asked me if I was the baggage man. I gave him the wink

" 'You will find the baggage man here after dinner,' and swung out on the platform, followed by my assistant and the westerner. The sheriff, who caught the cue, was persistent, and so, calling to the others that I would be in in a minute, went into the baggage room and around the other side of the train, gaining entrance to the baggage car through the op posite door from which we had left, and which I had purposely opened. All was clear sailing now, and it took but a sec-end to run the screws up and lift off the

DISCOVERED HIS DEAD PARENT. "There rested a rich coffin, and we both drew back against as our eyes fell upon the plate which bore the inscription

MOTHER.

"'It looks like sacrilege," said the sheriff, beginning to unscrew that part of the casket which covers the face. It was a most generous countenance I beheld The hair was sprinkled with gray, the forehead, which was high and of marble white ness, was partly covered with the stray curls that had escaped the comb. About the throat, otherwise unornamented, was a strand of pearls clasped with a diamond brooch of a peculiar design. The dress was silk. But the face! It seemed a part of my life. Where had those features bent over me? Where had those lips whispered to me? Where had I seen that brooch?" The emotions of the old baggage master evercame him, and for a moment his head sank down into his hands, and his frame trembled with the intensity of the feelings he could scarcely repress. He finally raised his eyes and continued in a busky

The sheriff quietly replaced the coverings our hands had so eagerly removed.
"When the two came back I felt weak and trembly like, and did not look either of them in the face.

back. He will tell you some great stories about the Dark Continent." Then he walked off at a rapid pace. Astonished though I was curiosity compever saw him. His name was Tom." I am your brother Tom." Chicago pelled me to take a seat on the same bench with the long haired man who was gazing into vacancy, and I ventured to remark that it was a pleasant day.

A farmer near Atlanta, Ga., not needing a coffin he bought for his sick child, the latter getting well, mounted it on four legs Lifting himself out of the fog of his re-flections my neighbor replied: "Delightful weather, indeed, but big game is scarce.
